1 Decline in world supply of cotton

The largest producers of cotton are China, the US, India and Pakistan. By 2001 there had been five years of declining international cotton prices, so in that year it was expected that cotton production would fall as farmers were discouraged from growing the crop by the low prices. This reduction in supply was then expected to cause prices to rise in the following year, 2002, when the cotton was put onto the market.

The fall in production was expected to occur in countries that were the most efficient, but there would be a fall in production in other countries also. Although India produces cotton, its average yield per hectare is half of the world average. This is because of low seed quality, insufficient pest control and poor irrigation due to irregular rainfall.

- (a) Explain why low prices might discourage farmers from growing cotton. [3]
- (b) Using a demand and supply diagram, explain the changes in price that were expected to occur between 2001 and 2002. [5]
- (c) (i) Identify what measures India might take to increase its production of cotton. [3]
- (ii) Explain how two of the measures chosen in c(i) might have effects on
- the fixed costs,
 - the variable costs and
 - the revenue of the producers. [6]
- (d) How would the earnings from cotton be shown in India's balance of payments? [3]

2 In 2002 in the UK and in Germany trade unions supported strikes in some public sector occupations.

- (a) Explain what is meant by the public sector and give one example of a public sector occupation. [3]
- (b) Describe the functions of trade unions and explain which function you consider to be the most important. [7]

3 It was reported in 2002 that people in Germany were expecting tax rises and an increase in unemployment.

- (a) Distinguish between a direct tax and an indirect tax. Give an example of each. [4]
- (b) Identify three types of unemployment and explain how they are caused. [6]

- 4 Changes in the population structure of many countries have led governments to introduce a health education programme.
- (a) Identify and explain two of the issues that a health education programme might cover in developing countries. [4]
- (b) How may the age structure of the population in a developing country differ from that in a developed country? [6]
- 5 As Eastern European economies continue to grow, companies are recording an increase in profits. Public and private sector investment are expected to rise as trade barriers are reduced.
- (a) What is meant by economic growth? [3]
- (b) Discuss whether economic growth is always advantageous. [7]
